The growing Arab-Israeli rapprochement may be good for the Middle East, but it poses problems for Beijing's strategy in the region.

In a world starved for good news, the normalization agreements that Israel recently signed at the White House with the United Arab Emirates and Bahrain were met with near-universal praise. In a region more often associated with risk, the deals seemed to signal opportunity—for stability, for peace, and for profit. One place where the news was not greeted so effusively, however, was in Beijing, where a government spokesman barely acknowledged the agreements despite China's strong relations with both Israel and the Gulf Arab states. China's wariness may turn out to be well-founded...
