The administration should take a three-track approach: provide a formula of reconstruction with no rearmament, bolster the PA through assistance conditioned on reform, and broker Arab outreach to open the horizon.

The Middle East has a way of imposing itself on American presidents and their administrations. Just ask President Joe Biden. With six phone calls to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and calls with President Mahmoud Abbas and President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi, he understood, whatever his hopes, that his personal involvement was necessary to help produce the ceasefire. And, while a trip to the Middle East had not been on his agenda at this time, Secretary of State Antony Blinken felt the need to go to the region to try to bolster the ceasefire, address humanitarian and reconstruction needs in Gaza, and establish a diplomatic track for managing Israeli-Palestinian relations and recommitting to a two-state for two peoples’ outcome. As someone who negotiated with the parties for decades, I know that each of these tasks contains its own challenges. Ironically, the least difficult one is bolstering the ceasefire...

Read the full article on the National Interest website.
RECOMMENDED

BRIEF ANALYSIS
Battle for al-Sinaa Prison: The Enduring Islamic State Threat in Syria
Jan 31, 2022
Ido Levy

BRIEF ANALYSIS
Gas Likely to Top Agenda of Qatar’s White House Visit
Jan 31, 2022
Simon Henderson

ARTICLES & TESTIMONY
The Ukraine Crisis: East Meets Mideast?
Jan 28, 2022
David Pollock
The Washington Institute seeks to advance a balanced and realistic understanding of American interests in the Middle East and to promote the policies that secure them.

The Institute is a 501(c)3 organization; all donations are tax-deductible.