Gulf squabbles over production quotas highlight the industry's uncertain future, but in the meantime Washington may have to deal with heightened pressure at home.

Another year, another oil price crisis. A year ago, deep in the first months of the COVID-19 pandemic, Saudi Arabia and Russia became embroiled in a battle of who should cut more oil production. With demand dropping but supply still high, prices had plummeted. At one point, some were actually negative—you literally couldn’t give oil away, a consequence of full storage tanks. Now, recovering from COVID-19, the world economy is reviving, but OPEC+ can’t agree on how much to open the tap...

Read the full article on the Hill website.
RECOMMENDED

BRIEF ANALYSIS

The Dubious Feasibility of a Planned Nuclear Reactor in Iraq
Jul 23, 2021
Mohanad Faris

ARTICLES & TESTIMONY

To Deter Iran, Give Israel a Big Bomb
Jul 23, 2021
Dennis Ross

BRIEF ANALYSIS

Profile: Al-Nujaba Satellite Television
Jul 22, 2021
Hamdi Malik

TOPICS

Energy and Economics
Gulf and Energy Policy
U.S. Policy

REGIONS & COUNTRIES

Gulf States

STAY UP TO DATE