

Actions, Not Just Attitudes: A New Paradigm for U.S.-Arab Relations

June 2010

The latest Pew poll on Middle Eastern political behavior illustrates the media's post-9/11 tendency to report on America's standing on the Arab street -- without analyzing whether attitudes toward the U.S. have any significant effect on actual Arab behavior. To remedy this striking diagnostic gap, The Washington Institute presents a study that utilizes hard statistics, unprecedented in scope and depth, to tackle the relationship between Arab political and economic activity on the one hand, and attitudes toward the United States expressed through public opinion polling on the other.

In Actions, Not Just Attitudes: A New Paradigm for U.S.-Arab Relations, Dr. David Pollock, a renowned expert on public opinion polling in the Arab world, presents and interprets massive databases that account for actual Arab political behavior at both official and popular levels, from twenty Arab states, over an entire decade. Concise case studies of a dozen key Arab countries complement the wealth of quantitative evidence that makes this report a unique and invaluable reference tool.

The conclusions of Actions, Not Just Attitudes run contrary to conventional wisdom and yet are uniquely compelling because they derive exclusively -- and refreshingly -- from factual record. Indeed, this solidly documented new study answers the questions that the media, and even government, are not asking.
